Q: Can I use this in switch case? Is this possible? switch(expression.charAt(i)){ case 'a': return "alpha"; case 'b': return "beta"; case 'c': return "..."; default: return "?"; } A: Yes, you can: var str = string.Empty; switch (expression.charAt(i)) { case 'a': str = "alpha"; break; case 'b': str = "beta"; break; case 'c': str = "..."; break; default: str = "??"; break; } return str; Note that in C#, you do not return multiple values in a single function (though you can create a tuple, and later access the values via the appropriate index). Instead, it is typically recommended to use an out parameter instead. A: switch (expression.charAt(i)) { case 'a': return "alpha"; case 'b': return "beta"; case 'c': return "..."; default: return "?"; } You are using switch when expression is not a string, but an object - so expressions are converted to strings and then comparing is done. Use the if statement instead: if (expression.charAt(i) == 'a') { return "alpha"; } if (expression.charAt(i) == 'b') { return "beta"; } Or: switch (expression.charAt(i)) { case 'a': return "alpha"; case 'b': return "beta"; case 'c': return "..."; default: return

By Jonathan Amos Science reporter, BBC News, Vienna A "calibrated" boost Many ground-based telescopes have variable optics, meaning that they are designed to take account of the different sunspot numbers in different years. But scientists at the European Southern Observatory (ESO) in the south of France said they could now develop a "calibrated" boost which could be incorporated into existing telescopes. It could be a valuable tool in preparations for exploring the outer Solar System, the researchers told the BBC. A spacecraft like the Voyager mission is limited by the range of its communication cables. In the past, if the distance to a celestial object was too far, the signal had to be transmitted through numerous hops and could be wasted. With the launch of the Galileo mission in 2003, astronomers could take advantage of the satellite's ability to communicate with ground-based telescopes and extend the reach of the radio waves through the Solar System. But more than a decade later, the 6.5-billion-euro (£5.3 billion) investment is still not fully productive. "Before now, it was impossible for ESO's instruments to even think about boosting, because the number of ground-based observations had been fixed for a long time," said Cathie Clarke from the University of Melbourne, Australia. Unusual twist But it emerged that the most recent ground-based sunspot numbers for 2007, an unusual year with only ten spots on the Sun, had been recorded with less than 60% accuracy. When the scientists took this data into account and applied their boosting technique, the result - when checked against the expected total count of spots - was just as well. A total of 181 of the 186 spots were registered, matching the expected tally exactly. The future of such technologies has not been too badly affected, Dr Clarke told BBC News. "It's not a threat that's presented to us - it's a tool. "It's a way of doing the numbers that gets us the data we want." However, the researchers did not point out that the activity of the Sun is actually on the rise, with 1853 spots detected last year, a return to the more normal cycle of 1465. The technique being tested at ESO is also being used to boost data gathered by the Planck satellite, which is studying the cosmic microwave background. One of the principal
