0 Comments Laptop or computer: Please select a product brand: We have been working over the past decade to make the future of high-performance computing great, and this is an exciting moment for us. It's also an exciting moment for the computing community, which has seen the rise of the supercomputing era and the ever-increasing power of our largest computing environments, culminating in the class of supercomputers that challenge our best CPUs. Let's quickly review how these systems are built and operate. They're increasingly made up of servers in different locations running on the cloud, cluster, or grid computing architectures. To keep up with the pace of technological advances, many have described recent cloud-based computing as involving one or more "silos" working in isolation (though multiple silos coexist and often can be thought of as processes interacting through shared events). However, the problem with these descriptions is that they do a disservice to the reality of what is taking place. Servers appear to be operating at opposite ends of the (virtual) computing infrastructure. However, they're actually closer than you'd think, as shown in Figure 1 below. Figure 1: Servers, whether local or cloud based, can be very small or very large, but they're usually in the same sort of rectangular data center. Source: Wikimedia Commons This sort of cloud arrangement is actually quite helpful for users. The software they need to run their applications is usually already running and maintained somewhere else. Servers build and maintain on a global level, and desktop or mobile clients operate on a local level. They also provide computing resources that clients and other researchers can use. The idea behind computational clouds is that researchers, researchers looking to conduct their work on supercomputers, and users with their own computers can access the resources of multiple servers (or "the cloud") for the duration of their use. They can be accessible from within research groups, corporations, educational institutions, and others seeking to use these resources. By designing the clouds as reusable, maintainable, and portable, researchers and others working with supercomputers can reduce the need to purchase additional equipment (as shown in Table 1). To achieve the goal of portability, a number of innovative approaches have been designed by a number of innovative organizations. For example, the US National Center for Supercomputing Applications (NCSA) is developing concepts, including the Open Science Grid and Open Science Commons, that aim to help scientists to achieve their computing needs on a cloud
